Lucy Van Scyoc

Superintendent, Tulare Joint Union High School District

When Dr. Lucy Van Scyoc walked into a Central Valley classroom as an 8-year-old newcomer from the Azores, she didn't speak a word of English. Her red and white dress was a hand-me-down, her haircut short and unfamiliar to her peers, and her sense of belonging felt completely out of reach. That was her first experience in the American education system – just miles from the Tulare Joint Union High School District, where she now serves as superintendent.

It's a full-circle moment that shapes Lucy's daily work. The same uncertainty that she once felt as a student,

EECU Honored for Support of Hmong Community

During the 2025 Hmong American Day celebration on May 3 and 4 at Fresno State, EECU was recognized for its support and commitment to the Hmong community.

The Fresno Center presented EECU with a special framed plaque and traditional Hmong xauv, an ornate silver neck ring or necklace that holds deep cultural, symbolic, and spiritual significance. It will be proudly displayed at our Sunnyside branch and cherished for years to come.

It was an honor to be part of this meaningful celebration, which honors the heritage, resilience, and cultural legacy of the Hmong community and commemorates their journey from Southeast Asia to the United States.

Our mobile branch was also on-site at the celebration to provide convenient access to financial information and services.

she now uses as fuel to build a more inclusive, supportive environment for today's learners.

"I went from being a little girl trying to avoid school to someone whose mission is to make school a place all students want to be," she says.

Born on the island of Terceira, one of the Azorean islands off the coast of Portugal, Lucy spent her early years in a close-knit village. Her life changed dramatically in 1984 when her family immigrated to California's Central Valley in search of opportunity. She says that Hanford was far different from the familiar safety of the island, where she had walked to school since kindergarten and everyone knew her name.

She says that her experience was difficult, but transformative, thanks in large part to her third-grade teacher, Mrs. Robinson. Lucy recalls how her teacher recognized her struggles and became her advocate, making vocabulary flashcards to help her learn English.

"She didn't have to do that, but she did," Lucy says. "That made all the difference."

This early experience as an English learner planted the seeds of empathy and advocacy that would later define Lucy's leadership style. But her challenges didn't stop there.

In high school, she encountered another hurdle – one rooted in systemic assumptions. "I told the counselor I didn't like science because I hadn't really had science in elementary school. So, they placed me in a non-college prep science course," she explains. "My parents didn't speak English well and didn't know how to advocate for me. They trusted the school to do what was best."

Ironically, Lucy would later become a science teacher herself, discovering a passion for the subject that had once been dismissed on her behalf. It's a personal story that underscores her firm belief today that students must be given choices – not limited by early labels or assumptions.

"As educators, our role is to provide options for students, not to pigeonhole them into specific areas," she says.

Her resolve was tested again during her junior year of high school, when tragedy struck. Her father was diagnosed with a brain tumor shortly after her 16th birthday and passed away nine months later. As the oldest of three siblings, Lucy's world turned upside down.

"Everything changed," she says. "I was taking AP classes. My dream school was St. Mary's in Moraga. But I needed to stay home to help my family."

Instead, she enrolled at College of the Sequoias before transferring to Fresno Pacific University. It wasn't the path she had originally envisioned, but was the one that set her on the path toward leadership in education.

Now, as superintendent of a diverse school district, Lucy brings these formative experiences to every decision she makes. Her leadership is grounded in her own journey as an immigrant, English learner, first-generation college student, and caregiver. She doesn't just talk about equity – she's lived the gaps in the system.

"I know what it feels like to be underestimated. I know what it feels like to be overlooked," she says. "That's why I fight for our students."

She believes deeply that every student should graduate from high school as college- and career-ready – not one or the other, but both.

"We celebrate students who go into trades and those who go to college," she says. "We need both, but the choice should belong to the student, not be made for them by adults who may not completely understand their potential."

Lucy is not only a district leader, but also a wife and mother. She and her husband, Chris, are raising three children and enjoy spending time cheering them on at water polo, baseball, cheer, and dance competitions. They also enjoy traveling as a family and have visited Terceira several times, where Lucy was able to share her cultural roots and childhood memories with her kids.

As superintendent, Lucy has emphasized student voice, culturally responsive teaching, and systems that support, not sort, young people. She is also committed to mentoring future leaders, speaking frequently to rising educators and aspiring administrators.

Lucy's story shows that resilience isn't just about surviving hardship – it's about using those experiences to build something better for others. In Lucy's case, that "better" is an educational system where every student feels seen, supported, and challenged to reach their full potential – regardless of where they begin.

"Education changed my life," Lucy says. "Now, it's my job to make sure it changes theirs."

Romance Scams are on the Rise

An increasing trend in romance scams has been reported across the country. This is a form of fraud where scammers target people through dating apps and social media, form fake relationships, and then play on their emotions to steal money or personal information.

Here's how it typically works:

A scammer creates a fake profile on a dating site or social media platform. They build a connection over time, earning trust through emotional conversations. Once trust is established, they ask for money – often for a supposed emergency, travel expenses, or a business opportunity.

What you can do to protect yourself:

- Never send money or gifts to someone you haven't met in person.
- Be cautious with what you share online.
- Report suspicious profiles to the platform.
- Talk to someone you trust before taking action.
- Beware of anyone trying to isolate you from friends and family.

If you think you might be the victim of a scam, talk to a trusted family member or your financial institution and report it to the Federal Trade Commission at ReportFraud.ftc.gov.
